

underlying the contrast between Asyria's historical and linguistic evidence and the evidence of the monuments, is that the former is based on a collection of fragments, and the latter on a continuous record. The fragments are the remains of a language which has been broken up into a mass of disconnected pieces, and the continuous record is the result of a language which has been preserved in its original form. The fragments are the remains of a language which has been broken up into a mass of disconnected pieces, and the continuous record is the result of a language which has been preserved in its original form. The fragments are the remains of a language which has been broken up into a mass of disconnected pieces, and the continuous record is the result of a language which has been preserved in its original form. The fragments are the remains of a language which has been broken up into a mass of disconnected pieces, and the continuous record is the result of a language which has been preserved in its original form.

The study of the fragments of a language is a task of great importance, and it is one which has attracted the attention of many scholars. The fragments are the remains of a language which has been broken up into a mass of disconnected pieces, and the continuous record is the result of a language which has been preserved in its original form. The fragments are the remains of a language which has been broken up into a mass of disconnected pieces, and the continuous record is the result of a language which has been preserved in its original form. The fragments are the remains of a language which has been broken up into a mass of disconnected pieces, and the continuous record
 is the result of a language which has been preserved in its original form. The fragments are the remains of a language which has been broken up into a mass of disconnected pieces, and the continuous record is the result of a language which has been preserved in its original form. The fragments are the remains of a language which has been broken up into a mass of disconnected pieces, and the continuous record is the result of a language which has been preserved in its original form.

Correction to JEOL 37, p. 51

10901-4 21
 21
 22
 23
 24
 25

Plate 1. Naville, pl. XXXI: 21-25.